TIPS FOR PROPOSAL WRITING

Are you ready for Grantseeking?

And what do Principal Investigators do, anyway?

Three basic conditions should be satisfied before you commit to grantseeking. First, successful grant proposals need a brilliant idea. Do you have an idea that is new, novel, or distinctively different that satisfies the needs of the grantmaker?

Second, successful grant proposals require a passionate commitment to the proposal idea. In the vernacular, you are in a courting relationship with the grantmaker.

Third, successful proposals take time. You will need sufficient lead time for proposal planning and blocks of uninterrupted quality time for proposal development and

The multiple roles of the Principal Investigator (PI), the lead project person, and the Grant Writer when developing major proposals, often involve multiple groups of people at different locations. Before beginning a major grant proposal, it is crucial that key project personnel understand their roles and responsibilities. Following are their main responsibilities. The PI is the project leader. A PI should lead the conceptual development of the proposal that shapes the need, goals, objectives, methods, evaluation, dissemination, and budget approaches. The PI should secure the "buy-in" of all project partners (programmatic, fiscal, and administrative), ensuring not just casual support but total commitment. This is done through regular and frequent communications

The PI should conduct pre-proposal contact with the current program officer as well as past grant winners and reviewers.

The PI should critique critically the multiple proposal drafts, concentrating initially on content and later on mechanics and for-The PI should ensure that timely feedback is provided throughout the proposal development process. Momentum builds as proposals are developed and progress should not be torpedoed by delayed feedback. The PI should respond quickly to writer's requests for ideas and technical language to fill proposal gaps. The PI should monitor input from project partners to ensure quality information is received in a timely manner.
